

How do I find behavioral health or medication management providers?

Things to know

Behavioral health is like specialty care (cardiologists, neurologists, etc), so we can expect the following:

- Many providers are booked out weeks to months, or have waitlists. If they are a great fit, this may be worth it. If you are in a crisis, see end of document.
- Many providers have limited availability that is most convenient for you. Many work partial weeks and partial days, don't offer appointments on weekends or in the evening, or certain parts of their day fill up quickly (after-school times, for example).
- Many providers that are good fits are often farther away than you expect. For example, Randall Children's Hospital, OHSU, or even your Primary Care Office may not be close to you.
- The more flexible you are able to be, the easier it will be to access.

What is goodness of fit?

- The way that a service matches the given criteria. In counseling and psychology, this means how well a therapist matches with the needs you have.
- This includes, but not limited to:
 - Provider specialties and modalities (types of therapy interventions used), expertise and experience, level and areas of training, level of licensure, complexity or risk of the client's needs, comfortability of the provider with given client needs, personality (between provider and client), ease of accessibility (does the provider respond quickly or did you wait weeks to hear back?).
- Other things you may value:
 - Location, insurance and payment, sex or gender of the provider, availability.

Other things you can expect:

- It may take some time to find a good-fit provider. You may consult with multiple.
- Many providers offer free or low-cost consultations. These can be over the phone and/or in person. This is the provider and client's opportunity to determine final goodness of fit.
- Parents can call for children under the age of 14 years old (the age of consent in Oregon). Anyone over 14 years old will need to call themselves, or be present during the call.
